she dropped her head on her knees and did not look up again until she was helped out of the room.

While the women were still there Smith was brought before the magistrate. He had told the detectives some time before this that he guessed it was all up with him and that the quicker he was locked up the pleasanter it would be for everybody. Asked what he had to say to the complaint of bigany made against him, he turned his head so that he could not see the women and rested his face on his arms.

smith was before them. She stood in front of him.

"Aren't you sorry for me, now, a little bit?" she said rather brokenly Smith turned away from her and pointed at the girl sobbing, on the chair.

"It's that poor girl over there I am sorry for, now," he said. Then they took him to the prison. for, now," he said. Then they took him to the prison. Mrs. Marian Brown Smith went to Mrs. Emma Seaman Smith and lifted her to her feet. "Come, dear," she said, "we had better go

"Come, dear," she said, "we had better go away"

A policeman stepped before them and opened the gate in the railing. The older woman held the younger about the waist and the two went out together. Emma Seaman Smith's head was hanging limp on Marian Brown Smith's shoulder as they walked and her hair was undone. She did not seem to know where she was going. Police courts are not given to diply of emotion, but every man in the room ross and stood silently with his eyes on the floor until the two had passed down the centre aisle and the door had closed behind them. Then, with a distinct busile of relief, the ne t case was called. The women entered a cab and started for Emma Seaman's home in Brooklyn. The ride was long, but it was not long enough for the histories of the perfidies of Charles Telfor Smith which they had to tell each other.

He continued to live with them, said Marian Brown Smith, until he had borrowed all of her mother's money for all sorts of schemes by which he said he could get rich very quickly indeed in Wall Street and in other ways. After awhile Mrs. Brown had to sell her house, because all her money was gone, and then she moved to New Rochelle and started a boarding house. (Emma remarked that her folke had lent Smith a lot of metrey too). The last mone transaction which Charles had with her mother, continued Mrs. Brown Smith, was when he rai ed $500 on her life insurance. He lived with them at New Rochelle, paring no board either for his wife, his baby bor. Is the flux to be withdrawn from Cuba? It is not one of 'Our New Possessions,' but our responsibility for it is Imbedded in successive and solemn declarations by almost every Administration since Mudison During all this time we have asserted, avowed: as a matter of national security and necessity a matter of protectorate over Cuba and its destinies Does anybody suppose that when this led to war Concress, while superfluously protesting the purity of its motives, deliberately meant to abandon this care of the national security, or reverse the necessary attitude of protection the Government had proclaimed for seventy-five years? Does anybody suppose we could abandon or reverse it now, with either decency or safety? When the proceedings of two coordinate branches of the Government seem to diverse, which has the greater weight, the deliberate, reasoned and continuous policy of three-quarters of a century, or the impulsive act of a night of high excitement?
